Dalton Deckerd

9/18/13

English Mod. 10

Pulling weeds is a lot like my reading and writing style. Like pulling weeds, I'm slow at reading also. Sometimes the weeds pull out easy, like when I find a book I want to read. Sometimes they are harder to pull, like when I read a textbook. After a while, writing gets boring just as reading does. Sometimes I get confused between a weed and a plant, just like sometimes I get confused on what I am writing about. But in the end, it is fun to read a great book, just like it is fun to see the finished garden without weeds.

Sometimes weeds pull out easy. Like when I read a book I really like, it comes easy and I just want to keep reading. For example, when I read "The Hunger Games", anticipation rising, I read it every night for at least two hours. It came easy and made me want to read.

Sometimes weeds are harder to pull. It is hard for me to read a textbook because they are so long and full of boring words. For example, when I get a reading assignment for Biology, I have to force myself to read it, mind aching, eyes drifting, because it is hard and not fun to me.

Weeding almost always takes long. Like weeding, I am a slow reader, but I usually understand all of it and get it all done. Writing is the same way for me because it is hard to organize my thoughts into the appropriate words. For example, this rough draft, my very long homework assignment, has taken me about an hour so far.

Sometimes I get confused between a plant and a weed. Sometimes reading can get confusing also. Like when I was little, I read harry potter, hoping for a good book, and it was way above my reading level so it really confused me.

After a while, weeding can get boring. Writing is a lot like that. I like to write, but writing too much gets boring. For example, there have been a few writing assignments where I did not know what to write about, so I couldn't decide, and got very bored.

But in the end, it is always fun to see the beautiful weed less garden. Just like after you finish a great book, or even in the middle of a great book. For example, when I read "Dust and Decay", I had so much fun reading! It was a very exciting book to read.